“In previous iterations of the FIFA franchise, we’ve made significant advancements in the physicality and animation of players, but the technology to analyze and apply this physicality to the real life football experience was just not there,” said Aaron McHardy, producer at EA Sports. “That’s changed with the introduction of the HyperMotion Engine. Using real player data in a way that hasn’t been done before gives us a tangible, authentic and immersive connection to the sport.” The HyperMotion technology allows game developers to experience full-body movements of players as they gracefully rip a free kick into the wall. The engine is embedded into the animations of players and applies physical behaviors such as how players can change their direction of attack or defensive pressure based on their player class. “We have worked with the largest number of real football players ever to achieve this technology,” added McHardy. “The system is constantly learning from these players and their unique characteristics, so players will adapt and evolve their on-the-ball actions, tackling style, and more. We’ve improved the AI systems to react more naturally to each player’s unique ball control, physique and style of play. We’ve also improved animation to give players a more natural, athletic movement style.” Moving beyond just the on-field interactions, the HyperMotion engine also uses motion capture data to affect the ball and the entire pitch. The game’s physics-based engine is now powerful enough to accurately model the ball’s mass, density and aerodynamics. This allows players to create realistic spins, feints, and passes that are created in real life during a match. FIFA 22 was co-developed by EA Canada and EA Los Angeles and is being published by EA Sports. The game will be available on PlayStation 4, Xbox One, and PC on September 29th. The game’s demo will be available on Xbox One and PS4 starting May 15, and on May 18 on the PC.), when they consider a government with sown armies and the peace to put down their enemy, when they look upon a well-ordered and well-constituted government, when they call to mind the calm of the present and the beauty of the future, they cannot do otherwise than love the government established over
