hypertension. Esophageal varices were diagnosed by upper gastrointestinal endoscopy, and the patient was scheduled for endoscopic ligation. However, massive and intermittent gastrointestinal bleeding occurred despite a sufficient preparation for the endoscopic procedure. As additional procedures, emergency esophageal variceal ligation (EVL), emergency transjugular intrahepatic portosystemic shunt (TIPS) and emergency surgery for lower gastrointestinal bleeding were performed. Emergency EVL for bleeding from esophageal varices is useful for acute bleeding, but bleeding recurred after two EVLs. A TIPS is a useful technique for the treatment of acute gastrointestinal bleeding from a portal hypertensive state, but the TIPS is technically difficult and carries a risk of portal vein thrombosis. In addition, the TIPS procedure is currently not a first-line treatment for esophageal varices because this procedure is a palliative one. There has been no report of emergency esophageal variceal ligation for a large esophageal varix, and in this case, the bleeding stopped immediately after surgery. Emergency surgery for lower gastrointestinal bleeding is a therapeutic choice in a patient with portal hypertension and is indicated for non-bleeding varices or varices with ruptured into the peritoneal cavity.Q: How to
