And yet, there have also been a lot of gossip about Google getting into the company's Web-browser space, apparently in partnership with Facebook. As reported in September, Microsoft has been moving to develop an all-encompassing messaging platform that will compete with WhatsApp, texting via text message, Facebook messenger, and more. Interestingly, as reported in April, Facebook is rumored to be planning to release its own messaging app that would function as a "Facebook Home for messaging." After Facebook's acquisition of WhatsApp in February, the companies seem to be working on building a mobile messaging app. It is unclear, however, if Google intends to provide a messaging platform and what for. In August, Google executives told Bloomberg that it was considering the Web-based options. "There are a couple of ways to think about it," Google executive chairman Eric Schmidt said. "One is 'we want to have 100 percent of your time on Google,' and the other is 'we are the platform, so let's create apps for that platform.'" While it's unclear if Google will be developing a mobile messaging app, it was reported in September that Google has been working on a browser alternative to Safari that it plans to release in 2017. Another mobile platform, Android TV, is also expected to be released during the same year. Source: Venturebeat How to use: 1. Open "CUBASE" or double-click CUBEFILE.CUBE 2.
