Specifically, I have an invertible matrix X and a vector x and would like to define $x' = X^{-1}X$ using a perturbation of the matrix product X x , since X is invertible. I think that the eigenvector- and function-based perturbations of the matrix product should be orthogonal to x . I do not know how to define the perturbations such that the norms are the same as for the matrix product. Is there any kind of literature on that topic? Any help is appreciated. A: See e.g. Eigenvalues, Eigenvectors, and Perturbations and Eigenvectors, Eigenvalues, and Perturbations of Matrix Products. Q: Copy constructor not called when using clone I'm trying to write a C++ class which uses the copy constructor to initialise the private data members and two virtual functions. The code looks like this, and has a few other things unrelated to the issue that have been removed for clarity: class AboutTableTable: public pcl::visualization::Visualizer { public: AboutTableTable(); ~AboutTableTable(); //! Default constructor AboutTableTable(const AboutTableTable &Other); //! Copy constructor AboutTableTable(const AboutTableTable& Other); pcl::visualization::PCLVisualizer::Ptr createColumnVisualizer(const std::string& Column, size_t HeaderTextWidth); pcl::visualization::PCLVisualizer::Ptr createColumnVisualizer(const std::string& Column, bool IsKey, const std::string &Key); }; The definition of the copy constructor is: AboutTableTable::AboutTableTable(const AboutTableTable &Other) { this->_Width = Other._Width; this->_Height = Other._Height; this->_Header = Other._Header; this->_Key = Other._Key; this->_Icon = Other._Icon; this->_Message = Other._Message; } The code in this class runs fine. However, when I compile this and run it with the debugger, I get an error from the cloned object's copy constructor: A valid configuration for this class cannot be determined. Please define a copy constructor. I believe that this is because the copy constructor is never called, as this is not a pointer to a class.
