Organizational change is a complex phenomenon that demands careful attention to consider the introduction of new approaches and to ensure that the consequences are assessed and managed. Ethics-based evaluation provides a framework for such an approach. We describe the development of a case study of an ethics-based evaluation of an organizational change effort aimed at reorganizing the nursing services of a hospital. Data collection included individual interviews and focus groups. Ethical standards for research involving human participants were adhered to throughout the study. The results show the importance of identifying the ethical principles and values that guide the organizational change. The ethical principles of honesty and candor provided the starting point from which the researcher investigated and planned the project. Critical realism provided the theoretical framework to investigate the organizational change. The trustworthiness of the findings was ensured through establishing credibility through peer review and the use of triangulation.
