From money transfers to payments and wealth management, blockchain is the new frontier for finance. According to Arthur Tietze, founder and CEO of blockchain company Akeneo, the main difference between a traditional bank account and a cryptocurrency account is that the latter allows digital payments to be made instantly, as well as making the transfer of funds to another person faster than a credit card transaction and cheaper than an international wire transfer. Read more: How to Use a Cryptocurrency Account Because of its ability to transfer funds more efficiently, Tietze believes that blockchain will make digital banking more intuitive and seamless for people. "It allows banks to match the speed of traditional financial services with the flexibility of online technology," Tietze said in a recent interview. Most major banks, including the big four players in the U.S., have released blockchain-based products over the past year, and this number is expected to rise as more financial institutions look to leverage blockchain's technology to create cost-effective, more efficient products. As a result of this increase in blockchain-based services, people will be able to use all their digital banking apps and devices, without having
